Early African American Missionaries

The Day Missions Library

George Edward Day was a professor of Hebrew at Yale who had an avid interest in foreign missions. After his retirement he dedicated himself to building a collection of books related to missions. The Day Missions Library was established in 1892. By 1932, there were more than 20,000 books in the Day Missions Library - 2/3 of the entire Divinity Library collection at that time.

The original Day Missions Library building downtown was replaced by the Day Missions Room when the Divinity School moved to Prospect Street in 1932.

The original focus of the Day Missions Library was on collecting:

- the history of missions in various countries
- missionary biography
- history and annual reports of missionary societies
- missionary periodicals
- works prepared by missionaries for the use of natives

Now an increasing focus on documenting World Christianity

A few stories of adventurous individuals....

John Marrant, a free Black from New York, was one of America's earliest missionaries to Native Americans. Marrant was a musician converted by hearing evangelist George Whitefield. Rejected by his family, Marrant lived among and preached to the Cherokee, Creek, Catawar, and Howsaw Indians from 1770 to 1775.

George Liele is considered to be the first American overseas missionary. In 1782, hearing that the British were declaring peace with the colonies, he indentured himself to a British officer in order not to be re-enslaved by his former master's heirs. He and his family moved to Kingston, Jamaica. After two years he had paid back his indenture and was able to devote all his energy to preaching. With four other former American slaves, he formed the First African Baptist Church of Kingston.

Much of early African American missionary activity was related to movements to repatriate freed Blacks – send them back to Africa. Individuals on either end of the political spectrum were interested in pursuing this idea – Southern land owners who were afraid that the freed Blacks would cause unrest and Northern abolitionists and clergy who thought that Blacks would be happier back in their original homeland. There was tension in the African American community about whether repatriation was a good idea, and if so, where Blacks should go.

In 1787, British philanthropists founded the "Province of Freedom" which later became Freetown, a British crown colony and the principal base for the suppression of the slave trade. By 1792, 1200 freed slaves from Nova Scotia joined the original settlers, the Maroons. Another group of slaves rebelled in Jamaica and traveled to Freetown in 1800.

David George left the Silver Bluff, S.C. Baptist Church – the first Black Baptist church in America - to go to Nova Scotia and minister to exiled Blacks there. Later, in 1792, he traveled with 12,000 Black settlers to Sierra Leone, West Africa where Great Britain had established a city of refuge for former slaves.

The Mendi Mission was established in Sierra Leone connection with the Amistad revolt. When the thirty-five surviving Africans returned to the Colony of Sierra Leone, the Amistad Committee instructed the Americans to start a "Mendi Mission" in Sierra Leone.

James W. C. Pennington, who unofficially attended Yale Divinity School in 1830s and is believed to be the "First Black Student" at Yale was instrumental in forming the Mendi Mission.

The American Colonization Society was formed in 1817 to send free African Americans to Africa as an alternative to emancipation in the United States. In 1822, the society established on the west coast of Africa a colony that in 1847 became the independent nation of Liberia. By 1867, the society had sent more than 13,000 emigrants.

Lott Carey, born a slave in Virginia, became pastor of the African Baptist Church in Richmond and in 1815 led in the formation of the Richmond African Baptist Missionary Society. Carey sailed for Africa in January 1821 with a group of Black emigrants. They initially joined the settlers of the American Colonization Society in Sierra Leone, but in 1822 Carey moved to Monrovia, Liberia where he established the first church in Liberia, Providence Baptist Church, and ministered to the congregation as well as to native tribes.

The Lott Carey Foreign Mission Convention, which was named after Carey, continues to be an active mission agency. It was founded in 1897 by African-American Baptists who were committed to a substantial foreign mission thrust – especially on the African continent.

Though not an appointed missionary, Jane Waring Roberts' life illustrates the important role of African-American women in the settlement of Liberia. Free women of color, in the North as well as the South, played crucial roles in organizing emigration. Jane Waring Roberts, the daughter of a Baptist minister, immigrated to Liberia from Virginia in 1824. Twelve years later, she became the second wife of Joseph Jenkins Roberts, Liberia's first president. In 1887, she started a project to build a hospital at Monrovia.

Born in St. Thomas in the U.S. Virgin Islands, Edward Blyden traveled to the United States, where he gained his first exposure to American racism. After the passage of the 1850 Fugitive Slave Act, he sailed to Liberia in December. Between 1858 and 1861, he was principal of a high school, was ordained as a Presbyterian minister, and served as the editor of the Liberia Herald.

Alexander Crummell unofficially attended Yale Divinity School in the early 1840's and pastored St. Luke's Episcopal Church in New Haven. He subsequently graduated with a theological degree from Queens College, Cambridge in 1853 and served as a missionary of the Episcopal Church in Liberia for twenty years.

Born into slavery, Richard Allen purchased his freedom while in his twenties and settled in Philadelphia. Allen founded the African Methodist Episcopal (AME) Church, which quickly became an important pillar in black institutional life. In 1830, he helped organize the American Society of Free Persons of Color and became its first president. Allen argued for Haiti as an alternative to Liberia for emigration of Blacks in America.

The African Methodist Episcopal Church developed an active mission program in Africa and the Caribbean, which continues into the present era.

Amanda Smith (1837-1915), African Methodist Episcopal Church evangelist and missionary, was born a slave in Maryland in 1837. She preached throughout the country, spent one year in England, two years in India, and 8 years in Monrovia, Liberia, West Africa. She later opened an orphanage in Illinois which was the only institution open to Negro orphans in the state.

Born a slave near Gainesville, Alabama in 1838, Maria Fearing learned to read and write at age thirty-three and worked her way through the Freedman's Bureau School in Talladega to become a teacher. At age fifty-six she went to the Congo, where for more than twenty years she worked as a Presbyterian missionary and eventually established the Pantops Home for Girls.

William Henry Sheppard (1865-1927) was one of the earliest African-Americans to become a missionary for the Presbyterian Church. He spent 20 years in Africa, primarily in and around the Congo Free State, and is best known for his efforts in publicizing the atrocities committed against the Kuba and other Congolese peoples by the Belgians.

Belgians working in the Congo cut off the hands of villagers who refused to harvest rubber. Reports by William Sheppard helped make the world aware of atrocities being committed against the native tribes.

Born into slavery in Maryland, Henry Highland Garnett escaped to New York with his father at the age of nine. An active abolitionist, he supported emigration and was a missionary for the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland in Jamaica in the 1850s. Returning to the United States, Garnett actively sponsored immigration to Haiti and Africa and was a founding member of the African Civilization Society.

In the mid-nineteenth century, James Theodore Holly, a fourth-generation Northern free man, was one of the strongest proponents of immigration to Haiti. As an agent of the Haitian Bureau of Emigration, he led a group of emigrants from New Haven and Canada in 1861. His wife, his mother, and two of his children died shortly after their arrival in Haiti. Although many settlers left the country, Holly remained on the island until his death. He became the first Episcopal bishop of Haiti in 1874.

Betsey Stockton was appointed as a missionary to Hawaii in 1822 by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. She is recognized as the first single woman missionary to go overseas in the history of modern missions. She served as a domestic assistant and conducted a school, teaching classes to the maka'āinana (commoners) farmers, their wives and children in Maui

Prior to going to Hawaii, Betsey Stockton had lived in the household of the president of Princeton College, where she had educated herself by reading in his library and had been tutored by Princeton Theological Seminary students. After establishing schools in Hawaii and Canada, she helped to start the first African American Presbyterian Church in Princeton—now known as the Witherspoon Street Presbyterian Church. Later, Stockton founded a night school and persuaded PTS students to teach young African Americans history, English, algebra, and literature.

Some Yale connections.....

Solomon Coles, a former slave, was the first black graduate to complete full three-year BD program at Yale Divinity School in 1875. He served as a missionary of the American Missionary Association in Corpus Christi, Texas.

The American Missionary Association originally grew out of a committee organized in 1839 to defend a group of African slaves who had mutinied against their Spanish owners and had brought their slave ship (the Amistad) into U.S. waters to seek protection there. The AMA itself was incorporated in 1846 by the merger of three missionary antislavery societies whose goal was to establish missions for freed slaves overseas.. When the Union armies began freeing slaves during the American Civil War, the AMA opened schools for them. The AMA founded more than 500 schools for freed slaves in the South in the decades following the Civil War.

YDS graduate Henry Hugh Proctor served as vice president of the AMA

Albert P. Miller served as a missionary of West African Mendi Mission for three years before graduating from Yale Divinity School in 1881. He later served as pastor of Pastor of Temple Street/ Dixwell Congregational Church in New Haven from 1885 to 1896.

SIERRA LEONE

Orishatukeh Faduma was a West African from Sierra Leone who graduated from Yale Divinity School in 1895 and won a scholarship to do further graduate work in religion at Yale. After completion of his studies at Yale, he sought appointment to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions but was refused a post ostensibly for financial reasons. Subsequently, he accepted an American Missionary Association appointment to head the mission church and school at Troy, North Carolina. He served for almost fifty years as a missionary educator in the American South and West Africa.

Josephus R. Coan, who graduated from Yale Divinity School in 1933 and died in 2004 at the age of 101, was a missionary in South Africa from 1896 to 1908 before going on to become a renowned Christian educator at the Interdenominational Theological Center in Atlanta.
